NIH Workplace Climate and Harassment Survey

Supplementary Frequency Tables

Survey Background

As part of its initiative to address sexual harassment at the National Institutes of Health (NIH), the Institute conducted a survey of all individuals working at or for NIH (i.e., federal employees, trainees, fellows, contractors, and volunteers) to:

- 1) Determine the extent of sexual harassment occurring at NIH;
- 2) Inform policy efforts by identifying potential factors associated with harassment;
- 3) Assess how NIH, through its supervisors and current harassment reporting systems, responds to those who have been harassed, and use this information to improve its harassment policies and systems; and
- 4) Establish a baseline assessment of harassment and associated factors to evaluate progress by NIH on this issue via future survey administrations.

Survey items were developed by an NIH survey team consisting of behavioral scientists and senior leaders, and administered from January 28 to March 25, 2019 by the IDI Science and Technology Policy Institute (STPI) using Qualtrics survey administration software. No one from NIH has ever had or will have access to individual-level data. Instead, any analyses of the survey were requested by NIH to STPI, who performed the analyses and provided the results in aggregated form to NIH. To further ensure confidentiality, STPI and NIH agreed that STPI would not provide data on any data cell that represents less than 15 responses.

The results of the survey are expected to inform solutions to create a respectful workplace. The survey instrument developed through this effort, and results obtained by fielding the instrument, will be disseminated to the U.S. scientific community to encourage rigorous assessment of harassment in the scientific workplace.

Supplementary Tables Overview

A review of key survey findings can be found in the NIH Workplace Climate and Harassment Survey Summary Findings Report. In that report, the NIH study team decided to include response options as percentages to maintain focus on high-level trends, comparisons between groups, and the disproportionate impact of harassment on vulnerable groups in the NIH workforce. To complement the summary findings report, the Supplementary Frequency Tables within this document include the number (i.e., frequency) of NIH survey respondents selecting each response option or declining to answer. Respondents were given the option to skip any question on the survey.

The purpose of the supplementary tables is to provide additional context to the survey findings and support the U.S. scientific community in potential future administrations of the survey instrument.
